- > Our four core strategies have delivered reasonable absolute and relative returns over the past year, underpinned by our commitment to data-driven analysis, thorough preparation, and adaptability
- > In a landscape marked by earnings bifurcation, we're overweight sectors that demonstrate robust performance, with a particular emphasis on what we believe are the promising future of tech and healthcare, especially GLP-1s, and AI, while prudently scaling back in areas facing unpredictability
- > Attuned to geopolitical shifts and policy changes, like recent elections in Europe, we remain active in capitalizing on the growth prospects of vibrant markets such as India, while maintaining caution in China's evolving regulatory environment

Our four core strategies have delivered reasonable absolute and relative returns over the past year, underpinned by our commitment to data-driven analysis, thorough preparation, and adaptability.

We remain bullish on the US and emerging markets, particularly India and Brazil. From a sector perspective, we remain overweight technology in each of the core strategies and health care in our developed market strategies, while underweight consumer discretionary, financials, and industrials.

Most importantly, while we did make more portfolio changes in Q2 than the prior quarter, what remains unchanged is that there are only two things in our opinion that continue to matter globally in 2024: Nvidia and Taylor Swift. All joking aside, while both Jensen and Swift continue to dominate the earnings picture, we did add to areas like consumer staples, where we view the steady eddy compounding nature of global brands such as Coca-Cola to be not only diversifying to our portfolio but also trading at reasonable valuations relative to their 10-year averages.

While we recognize a changing risk landscape—including global elections, regulatory developments, and geopolitical uncertainty—we continue to hold our often-cited view of “calibrated optimism.”

With that being said, let’s run through some “frequently asked questions,” predominantly as they relate to things we own versus things we do not own (or do not own much of).

Around the Horn

As global equity investors with one team covering both developed and emerging markets, we always remind folks that we find this relationship to be symbiotic. In our view, being informed emerging market investors makes us better developed market investors, and vice versa. Though we apply a global lens to investing, that does not mean we want to own the entire universe.

A Returns Based View

[wpdatatable id=19]

Starting in Asia, one of the primary questions we receive is on our views of Japan, particularly in light of recent changes to monetary policy as well as equity market performance reaching multi-decade highs.²

While Japan has done well from an MSCI Index perspective, it has been outpaced quite significantly by some of its developing market peers, especially India and Taiwan, as shown above.

Over the past several years, our portfolios have generally been underweight Japan. That has gone largely unchanged, given that the Japanese market tends to be dominated by cyclicals and many higher quality companies in Japan tend to trade at premiums to their global peers. So, while we actually do quite like Japan as tourists, given the abundance of cheap goods for non-Yen holders, we continue to find better opportunities elsewhere from an investment perspective.

Staying in Asia, we have become less negative on China at the margin, but our view is that much uncertainty remains regarding earnings growth. There have been some green shoots across narrow areas, such as gaming, with gaming approvals so far this year tracking above those of the last several calendar years. However, we believe every company in China is now functionally a State-Owned Enterprise (SOE), with CCP representation in the boardroom of private sector companies. Beyond this, a large crackdown on “conspicuous consumption” appears to have accelerated. We understand that Chinese social media platforms like Weibo, Tencent, Douyin, and Xiaohongshu removing user posts that flaunt personal wealth and opulence, appearing to be part of a broader effort to “purify the internet cultural environment.”³ We do think this has overarching implications as well, particularly in luxury goods, which could be a net negative for high-end producers selling into China.

Even though we do not think things will get materially worse in China from an economic data perspective, it is hard to see things getting meaningfully better either. Contrast that with the likes of India, where we remain very sanguine and maintain broad-based exposure across infrastructure assets, banks, commodities, and communication services.

Switching gears over to Europe, perhaps the largest developments were less investment-related in nature but more political, as both the UK and France announced snap elections during the quarter.

In the UK, the losing party, the Conservatives, got 18 per cent of the seats in the UK general elections and many headlines were written as a total “landslide defeat”. They’re not incorrect, given that this was the worst defeat since the party began over 130 years ago. However, contrast that with the Indian elections, which also took place during the quarter, where the headlines highlighted an 18 per cent total seat grab for the opposition party as a loss for the incumbent Modi’s BJP party. It was a rather amusing twist of interpretation as showcased in the headlines below. Thankfully, though, we think this is precisely what continues to create a very attractive landscape for folks who are comfortable being uncomfortable.

It is a very good example where our ability to focus on the data rather than the narrative is one of our competitive advantages. Adani is a prime example of that, in our opinion.

Over in France, pollsters have generally been off the mark since Macron called for the snap elections back in June. Up until the actual second round voting took place on 7 July, Marine Le Pen's National Rally was expected to receive the most seats. However, the left wing New Popular Front ended up with the most seats thus leaving the country with its most divided parliament in decades.

From an exposure perspective, our European holdings remain very global in their earnings stream, from healthcare to staples as well as semiconductors and oil and gas, so again we are less concerned about any one or two jurisdictions but given the uncertainty that these events have created, these are certainly risks that must be monitored.

Finally, we'll discuss the US and bring this quarter's theme—"Context is Key"—into focus.

| Earnings, Not Narratives

Whether it is Nvidia, GLP-1s, Mag 7, or Fab 5, AI, "narrow markets," or politics, narratives are powerful. They are also often felt most acutely in the US, which has been the case this year.

From our perspective, there is not a lot of "news" here because markets are almost always narrow. It is quite rare to have full breadth and depth across markets because there are almost always winners outpacing others. What in our view is important, however, is how bifurcated markets have become, particularly after a decent period of uniformity, and that became more pronounced this quarter.

Return Asymmetry

There is no doubt valuations in the US are on the higher side, but this also comes with a lot of high quality, extremely well-run businesses, in our view. For something like AI specifically, this is one of the few areas where we saw changes during the quarter.

S&P 500 Technology Sector:

*no data reported for the Q1 2024 rev beat and eps miss column. Price action represents average relative price performance from one day before to close of earnings report date.

Given the stickiness of many software businesses, our view six to nine months ago was that there would be some key winners in the AI space. However, across the earnings landscape, there were a variety of misses, suggesting that fundamentals were not keeping up and winners were not nearly as uniform as originally suggested, as highlighted here.⁴

Furthermore, the market's reaction to both revenue and EPS misses for the US technology sector were nearly night and day from Q4 2023 to Q1 2024, as highlighted below. But context here is key because not everything gets caught up in the downdraft.

Contrast the fundamentals of many of the software companies with that of Nvidia, whose earnings continue to be robust. They are a clear winner, in our view, on AI implementation and there has been virtually no multiple expansion from when we purchased it in 2023

(~approximately 30x forward). Therefore, we reduced our software exposure and re-calibrated into names we already own, such as Nvidia and even the Eli Lilly's of the world, while adding some consumer staples as well, as noted earlier.

Cracks in the Dam

"Salesforce executives told investors that deals are shrinking or getting delayed. Dell said its margins is getting smaller. Okta highlighted macroeconomics challenges. And Veeva's CEO said on his company's earnings call that generative artificial intelligence has been 'a competing priority' for customers."

Source: CNBC. 1 June 2024.

Perhaps some of you are thinking that staples side by side with GLP-1s is bit strange, given the prevailing narrative that more folks taking GLP-1s will "eat into" the profits of those staples. That may be somewhat true in the short run, as folks adjust to the drugs, but we think that spending will shift to other categories or "healthier" options from these companies over time. In fact, Nestlé is just now rolling out a US product suite, its first in nearly three decades, to cater to the Zepbound/Ozempic crowd. Markets and businesses tend to adapt to the prevailing conditions, and we believe this will be the case over time.⁵ Furthermore, on the GLP-1 front, we continue to see data that underpins our view that we have not scratched the surface in terms of folks using these wonder drugs and their myriad benefits, such as the most recent one from Eli Lilly showing efficacy across sleep apnea.⁶

| Data Dependent

While we have experienced somewhat calm waters so far this year, no doubt Q2 had a few reminders that nothing is risk-free. We are quite proud of our overall performance, but of course, we know this will not always be the case, and we fully expect major events to navigate as we make our way through the second half of this year. What precise events will be thrown at us, who knows, but that is also why an ark is built prior to the rain, not during it. In our view, portfolio management is quite similar—we do not need to predict events; we simply need to prepare for them, and we will continue to watch the data to tell us what type of weather may be ahead.

As always, thank you for your continued support.
