- > Our US portfolios outperformed our non-US portfolios in 2024, driven by technology and AI-related companies, with GQG's core strategies maintaining outperformance over the three- and five-year time periods
- > While GLP-1 names detracted from performance over the year, we remain optimistic about the sector and believe the market is underappreciating the long-term potential and stickiness of these drugs
- > Despite allegations against individuals affiliated with the Adani Group in late 2024, we remain comfortable with our exposure, given the companies' critical role in India's long-term infrastructure buildout

Despite not ending 2024 on a high note, it is tough to discount global equity market returns in aggregate for the year, particularly following a strong 2023. As has been the case for a while now, our US-centric portfolios outperformed non-US-centric ones, given US technology's dominance over the past two calendar years.

Because of this, some of our major topics this quarter will likely resemble those considered throughout 2024 and at the end of 2023: a discussion on India, the opportunity set in China, the impacts of energy, and a couple of revolutions underway, particularly in technology (AI) and pharmaceuticals (GLP-1s).

However, this bout of déjà vu is not for a lack of ideas or topics to write about—far from it, in our view. Rather, it is more in line with giving a sermon, which can be quite good for the soul. It is also about sharing our thoughts on our most impactful exposures, given their significance not only to returns but also to headlines during both the quarter and throughout the year.

This does not mean it is all good news. After all, not all sermons want to be heard. We are never satisfied with underperformance across any time period, and Q4 2024 was no exception. Thankfully, we are well aware that that this business is won and lost over time, and we remain quite proud that our longer-term core strategy outperformance is firmly intact across the board on a three- and five-year basis, despite some mixed results on a one-year basis.

That said, in typical year-end fashion—with one eye on reflection and one eye to the future—let us highlight a few areas that were not only impactful in 2024 but are also likely to remain top of mind for 2025 and beyond.

| INDIA'S INFRASTRUCTURE COMPLEX

In keeping with our déjà vu theme, nearly one year ago, in Q4 2023, we initiated positions¹ across a variety of Adani companies following a critical short-seller report. Fast forward to November 2024, and separate allegations against Adani surfaced—this time not from a short seller but from the US Department of Justice (DOJ) and the Securities Exchange Commission (SEC). Naturally, we take these allegations seriously, given their source. That said, and with the benefit of having more information today than we did on 20 November 2024, our views are essentially unchanged from a year ago.

From an investment perspective, it is important to underscore our view of how critical the Adani companies are to India's infrastructure complex. Consider the following data points:

- Adani-controlled airports handled more than 20 percent of all Indian air traffic and approximately 30 percent of all air cargo, while covering 50 percent of all domestic routes. Given India's population of nearly 1.5 billion, this is no small feat.²
- Adani also controls about 30 percent of all Indian port capacity, with nearly three times faster turns than government-owned ports, by our estimates. Approximately 60 percent of these volumes are under long-term contracts, generally up to 30 years, providing for a high degree of visibility into earnings streams.³

More importantly, we remain committed to our process and to taking thoughtful risk in building portfolios for our clients. We pride ourselves on avoiding knee-jerk reactions to headlines and instead focusing on what we deem as material to the underlying businesses we hold in client portfolios. As always, we continually review new information and adjust our portfolios accordingly.

There are several other key areas across our portfolios that were quite impactful for both the year and the quarter, let us highlight some of those items as well.

ON REVOLUTIONS

Heading into 2024, we identified two primary areas where we felt true revolutions were underway: AI and GLP-1s. While these were also big themes in 2023, our view was that these two areas, in particular, were like freight trains—or perhaps bullet trains—making significant strides forward. AI drove advancements in this play out

To use another Yogi Berra quote, in addition to this letter's title: "Forecasts are hard, especially about the future." So, hindsight is what it is. However, when following the data, it seemed clear to us that something profound was underway, and in that sense, we happened to get those two major "revolutions" right. That said, we cannot predict the future. Following the data does not always help with any particular moment in time, thus our Tolstoy quote.

| WINNERS AND LOSERS OF 2024

One revolution (technology/AI) was a large contributor to our returns for the year, while the other (healthcare/GLP-1s) was a net detractor. Starting with tech, this was one of our best-performing sectors for the year. Despite reducing our firm-wide exposure based on key data points—including end-user demand, potential pull forward, and bifurcated earnings—there were clearly some standout winners. Our focus was to consolidate our exposure across those areas.

Naturally, one company that we spent nearly the entire year on was Nvidia—and for good reason. The company has been one of the best-performing stocks for nearly two years and dominates the AI chip space, with some estimates suggesting it holds 80 to 85 percent of market share.⁴

Despite this, we ultimately reduced our exposure in 2024 due to profit-taking and potential issues related to sales in China. Regardless, Nvidia remains a key winner in our view given its scale, execution, and unparalleled hardware and software integration.

| A SOUR APPLE

Here is where things get interesting. Negative news at the margin does not necessarily mean avoid; it may simply mean reducing exposure, depending on what else is happening across the opportunity set. While Nvidia has performed well, its story has been driven more by earnings than by price. In contrast, consider another cohort of the “Magnificent 7” and the current largest company in the world by market cap—Apple.

Apple has performed very well, but in our view, this has been much more a story about price than earnings. Apple has also faced a bevy of bad news, including a lackluster upgrade cycle on the back of Apple Intelligence,⁵ discounts in China,⁶ and rumors of a ceasing of production for the Vision Pro.⁷ Despite this, the price keeps rising.

When comparing companies, what we get for what we pay matters a lot. Apple now trades at a higher forward P/E than Nvidia, despite having arguably less than half the sustainable earnings growth. In our view, Apple is a great company, but not so much a great company to own at this time.

THE WEIGHT OF EXPECTATIONS

Contrast the plight of rising price without a similar growth in earnings with those of the other side of our revolutionary coin: GLP-1 manufacturers, specifically Novo Nordisk and Eli Lilly. While Lilly, although off its highs, remained in positive territory, Novo was one of our main detractors during the quarter. Unlike Apple, where negative news appeared to have little impact, relatively little news seemed to have a significantly negative impact on Novo.

Despite the short-term setback, we believe the obesity market remains nascent and is likely to remain a duopoly between Novo and Lilly. In our view, demand for GLP-1s is high enough that both incumbents can do well, particularly given their significant manufacturing advantages in GLP-1 production, driven primarily by their scale and specialized facilities.

ON CHINA AND ENERGY

We have spent far more time discussing China in prior quarters—certainly in Q4 of 2023. While our views have not changed drastically, they are marginally less negative than they were in the recent past. As the euphoria of late Q3 2024 and early Q4 2024 wore off, prices are now far off their peak from an MSCI China perspective.

The equity market in China has been reacting to a three-day rolling government headline while also seeing further deterioration of macroeconomic data: the yuan declining relative to the US dollar, 10-year government bond yields hitting all-time lows, slowing manufacturing, and more. Yet, earnings estimates for a variety of companies have been reasonable. Could we finally be entering a period where in China, things are “so bad, it’s good”? Time will tell, and we will continue to monitor the data as we move through the new year.

COLD WINTERS, HOT EMISSIONS

Lastly, on energy:
2024 was not kind

to the sector, despite the price of oil staying relatively flat throughout the year (starting 2024 in the low 70s and ending
the year in the low 70s). We continue to find what we believe is good value globally in select names
where cash flows and payouts to shareholders remain high, relative to other areas of the market.

Something “Old”

One interesting piece of data that stood out to us is that the colder it gets, the more people reach for “traditional” sources of heat. This makes sense, but it poses challenges for meeting emissions goals, like those set across the EU generally or in Germany specifically. In fact, the last time Germans were worried about the coming winter—back in the summer of 2022—they were not looking for solar and wind but rather for firewood.

Not only that, but firewood and wood pellets are classified as “biomass” and therefore show up in the “renewable” column of energy sources. However, according to a European Commission study, wood pellets produce more CO₂ per unit of energy than fossil fuels.⁸ All of this is neither comforting nor bullish for Germany, regardless of wood's "renewable" status.
